

Winter Hardship at the Zoo

A poem from 1948

- Article type: material
- Author: Mareike Vennen
- Translated by: Carla Welch
- Text license: CC BY-SA
- DOI: 64y2-m311/49

Poem by zoo visitor K. Ferber about "Winter Hardship at the Zoo", 06.10.1948. (AZGB. All rights reserved.)

A poem sent to director (Katharina Heinroth) by a visitor in autumn 1948 does not just give us an impression of the situation at the zoo back then but also relates some of the (compassion) that Berlin's population had for the fate of the zoo animals. At the zoo, as in Berlin, there was (not enough of anything) – not enough food, construction materials, or fuel. Back then, in the midst of the Berlin Blockade, Katharina Heinroth and her staff were on the verge of being forced to give the animals away to other zoos or to have them killed due to (feed scarcity). The director thus issued a call to the population in the daily newspapers to support the zoo by donating food or gathering acorns and chestnuts. The poem is one of many other pieces of writing that reveal the willingness of Berlin's residents to help and gives us an idea of the role that the zoo played for them during this time – as one of the few sites of recreation and possibly connected with the idea of a community united in times of trial.

Transcript

Winter Hardship at the Zoo.

Is it true? Is the zoo in need?

Could animals be killed?

Because no food for the monkeys

Can be procured?

And above all because it will be too cold

For the animals soon

And so far there has been

No coal from the city?

Well, that's just great.

It's not really anything to smile about.

No Berliner would be happy ever again

If it really closed down, the zoo,

Which is why we should not rest,

But band together,

Direct all our efforts

Towards freeing the zoo of its woes

If we don't want to lose it –

Our zoo and its animals!

What we can do,

Tell us now Frau Heinroth!